

BUILDING FUTURES. TOGETHER.

Every Request Tells a Story

At Don Bosco Youth Education for All (DBYEA), the need for educational support is no longer something we encounter only through formal programmes. It comes through messages, phone calls, referrals from communities and requests from young people and families who are struggling to keep education within reach. Behind every request is a story.

A child who has performed exceptionally well but comes from a family that cannot afford school fees.

A university student who is determined to complete his studies but is struggling to meet basic educational expenses.

A vulnerable community asking for opportunities for children who risk being left behind.

And organizations working directly with disadvantaged young people that are searching for partners to expand their educational work.

These requests are a reminder that the demand for education and youth empowerment is growing—and that no single organization can respond to it alone.

A Brilliant Student

Should Not Be Stopped by Poverty

One recent request came from a family in Kirche District, Mahama Sector, seeking assistance for a young student whose family is facing severe economic hardship.

The student reportedly achieved an impressive 98% result.

Yet academic ability alone cannot guarantee that a young person will remain in school.

The family's difficult living conditions make the cost of education a serious challenge. The person making the request has appealed for support and has even invited DBYEA to visit the family and assess their situation firsthand.

What happens when a talented young person has the ability to succeed, but their family's financial situation threatens to end their education?

For DBYEA, the answer should be simple: we should do everything possible to ensure poverty does not become the reason a promising young person is left behind.

The Requests Are Coming From Beyond School Fees

The growing demand is also visible among students in higher education.

A Civil Engineering student at RP Musanze College recently reached out seeking modest financial assistance to help meet educational and essential student expenses.

His ambition is to become a professional engineer and contribute to Rwanda's development.

His request illustrates another reality: support cannot stop at primary or secondary education.

Young people also need opportunities to complete vocational training, college and university education and transition into productive careers.

EMPOWER EDUCATE
ELEVATE

At the same time, DBYEA receives approaches from organizations seeking partnerships around after-school education, community development, sports and youth empowerment.

These approaches demonstrate the breadth of the need—and the opportunity for DBYEA and its partners to create greater impact.

Why DBYEA Needs Donors and Partners

As a local organization working close to communities, DBYEA is in a unique position to see the needs as they emerge. But identifying a young person in need is only the beginning.

Support vulnerable students with school and education-related costs.

Expand skills and vocational training opportunities.

Provide young people with relevant digital and professional skills.

Support education initiatives reaching disadvantaged communities.

Use sports and other activities as pathways for youth development.

Build partnerships with organizations working directly with vulnerable young people.

Assess and verify individual cases so that assistance reaches those who genuinely need it.

Develop sustainable programmes rather than responding only to emergencies.

The Need Is Growing. Our Response Must Grow Too.

DBYEA does not want to build a model where young people simply come asking for help and the organization repeatedly has to say, 'We do not have the resources.' Instead, we want to build a stronger ecosystem in which donors, businesses, foundations, development organizations, individuals and local partners can join DBYEA in creating pathways for young people to learn, develop skills and build independent futures.

We Are Looking for Partners Who Believe in Young People's Potential

The increasing number of requests reaching DBYEA is not simply a challenge. It is also an opportunity.

It tells us that young people and communities see education as a pathway to a better future—and that they are looking for organizations willing to stand beside them.

As a local NGO working on the ground, DBYEA is seeking donors, foundations, companies, institutions and individuals who want to invest in the education and future of vulnerable young people in Rwanda.

We invite you to become part of the response.

Your support can help turn a request for assistance into a story of opportunity.
